Significant departures from current practice would be needed to implement alternatives such as pay-for-performance programs rewarding physicians for high-quality care and penalizing them for inadequate or inefficient care, or the use of generic drugs through forced substitution or generic reference pricing, which would free up funds for new, innovative, and often more expensive treatments. Eight hospitals run by the metropolitan government and related corporations have been accredited for the quality of services offered to foreign patients, including multilingual assistance.

Uninsured patients are responsible for paying 100% of their medical fees, but fees are waived for low-income households receiving a government subsidy. Nor must it take place all at once. According to an by Ryoza Matsuda, a health policy expert at Ritsumeikan University in Kyoto, 80 percent of hospitals are privately run.

Six 'Facts' About Healthcare in Japan

A government survey for 2007, which got a lot of attention when it was released in 2009, cited several such incidents in the Tokyo area, including the case of an elderly man who was turned away by 14 hospitals before dying 90 minutes after being finally admitted, and that of a pregnant woman complaining of a severe headache being refused admission to seven Tokyo hospitals and later dying of an undiagnosed after giving birth. Overall the industry is growing, with all three of the leading providers seeing moderate increases in revenue over the last three years.

Employee Benefits In Japan

The total amount of work, however, did not decrease, forcing each employee to work harder. Also, monthly thresholds are set for each household, again depending on income and age, and medical fees exceeding the threshold are waived or reimbursed by the government. Thus, hospitals still benefit financially by keeping patients in beds.
