ANALYSING WOMEN'S MOVEMENTS<sup>1</sup>

MAXINE MCKENNEY

Despite the appearance of an extensive literature on women's movements and the steady growth since the mid-1970s in works which offer a critical feminist engagement with political theory, discussion of the broader implications of women's politics remains a relatively unexamined aspect of the development literature. There have been some recent attempts to redress this absence,<sup>2</sup> yet it is as if the debate within feminist political theory and the field of development studies have pursued parallel paths with little real engagement with each other. This is all the more remarkable given the impact of women's movements on policymaking and politics in the developing world.

Meanwhile, the analysis of women's movements both historically and cross-culturally has demonstrated the range and diversity of the forms of solidarity women have engaged in, yet has often been too heavily concerned with problems which are significant to particular cases.<sup>3</sup> Yet it could be said, without too much loss of exaggeration, that the attention devoted to women's movements has had at least two significant consequences. In the first place, it has tended to marginalise discussion and analysis of other political phenomena which are at least as much significant, but for which they have contributed to our defining their relevance, even for discussing women's movements, and to what they have achieved or pursued. Secondly, some of the dominant assumptions about women's movements (used in the development literature) remain quite problematic. In what follows I will offer some thoughts on the ways in which contemporary debates about women's movements might be revised so as to address the new context which gender politics continues to be developing in.

Women's movements and female collective action

The interest in women's movements has a long history. Its most recent origins go back even three century years to the work of feminist historians such as Judith Sargent Murray, Lavinia Lloyd Dock and Olive Rabeau,<sup>4</sup> whose aim was to recover a 'hidden history' of female activism. This early work was not only concerned to establish that women were participants and not bystanders in the events of history, but it also suggested that women's political involvement was of a distinctive character and significance. As political activists women were seen to represent their struggles, practices, strategies and goals, within given specific contexts. In subsequent and continuing debates, these 'new' women's movements (in response to some essential feminist debates or derivatives of the specific
