A new court, with a jury chosen by Nkrumah, found all the accused guilty and sentenced them to death. These factors rapidly eroded the limited support the Linann government enjoyed among civilians and soldiers. This merely established him as a leader and hero, building popular support, and when the first elections were held for the Legislative Assembly under the new constitution from 5-10 February 1951, Nkrumah still in jail won a seat, and the CPP won a two-thirds majority of votes cast winning 34 of the 38 elected seats in the Assembly.

A strong unity developed, however, as the various communities subordinated their individual interests to central authority in matters of national concern. The gradual emergence of centralized colonial government brought about unified control over local services, although the actual administration of these services was still delegated to local authorities. Another superstitious belief among Akan people is that one should not sweep at night.
