Poster Adverse Behavior A flurry of activity in most revised articles for promotion may lead to "junk science." "not everybody is going to do groundbreaking science that is going to instantaneously change policy, there is a lot of important research that happens incrementally, and we have to be careful to not incentivize (the former) too much" Assistant Scientist, Department of Epidemiology	Undervalue intensified efforts Efforts risk going unnoticed, undocumented, and ultimately unrewarded for reasons below: Attribution vs contribution of research to decision-making Faculty recognized that decisions are often made on the results of a multitude of studies and that their study alone may not change policy or practice. Obtaining discretion and anonymity preclude mention "Countries don't necessarily want to advertise their health problems, or they want to keep control on the message." Associate Professor, Department of Epidemiology While incentives might provide the impetus for amplifying efforts, not all will bear fruit due to issue salience, inconsistent practices, disconnect between research recommendations and implementation, changing networks, unsuitable environments for research impact, conflicts of interest, sensitivities and privacy. "We had achieved buy in from key decision maker and then there were elections and that person is no longer elected - this is something beyond your control." Research Assistant, Department of International Health This was noted in international as well as domestic collaborations.
Disadvantage unprepared Faculty Particularly for those who work in the basic sciences, hold menial secure track positions, are early in their careers, and/or feel ill-equipped with respect to the necessary skills or experience. "Junior faculty need lots of first author papers and to a lesser extent grants. If you are spending a lot of time building these relationships that take away time from doing the things that you're supposed to be doing for promotion." Assistant Scientist, Department of International Health
May inadvertently penalize faculty being appraised on activities that are either irrelevant to them or that for which they are particularly disadvantaged "This is now built into the article requirement in the CV. That actually feels more stressful for me. It's kind of the opposite of an incentive. When I don't have those things, I worry that I need more service activities on my CV." Assistant Scientist, Department of International Health

A great deal of what I-O psychologists do in this area is subjected to close scrutiny by courts of law, civil-rights groups, and professional colleagues. I discuss examples of this in detail in Appendix C.
