Between 1630 and 1643, about 20,000 Puritans arrived, settling mostly near Boston; after 1643 fewer than fifty immigrants a year arrived.

Readings and Films

New immigrants to the metropolis were often cut off from networks of support such as family and friends, and women's wages were typically significantly lower than men's, and their jobs less secure. Before the growth of high schools after 1900, most women left school after the eighth grade aged around fifteen. The close historical ties between the history of the 19th century women's movement and the 19th century abolitionist movement and the involvement of women historians of the 1960s and 1970s in the movements of the New Left, including the civil rights movement, fostered considerable interest by white women historians in the history of Black women as a corollary to their interest in social movement history generally.
