An afterword by Russell McCutcheon reflects on the critical study of religion at the University of Alabama and rounds out this superb collection.

Indigenous protective occupation and emergent networks of spirited refusal

Though many are priests or nuns, and virtually all consider themselves to be devout Catholics, they often proclaim their distance from the institutional Church. More characteristically they say they are doing, and that their doings may, incidentally, be seen or overheard. Participants enter facilities, military or private, where equipment to be used in the production or deployment of nuclear weapons is manufactured or stored, pour their own blood over the equipment and beat on it with household hammers, and perform what they often describe as a liturgy at the site.

What rhetorical tactics do they use as they address various audiences, to bolster and even complete the aims of the actions themselves? He is the author of several books, including Tantra: Sex, Secrecy, Politics and Power in the Study of Religion 2003 and The Church of Scientology: A History of a New Religion 2011.

Works like these leave little doubt that religious groups are exemplars of boundary work, laboring to articulate and demonstrate understandings of themselves as pious contra the wicked, moral contra the immoral or amoral, saved contra the damned, chosen. The actions become more fully public in the telling, where they go from being public in theory which is not unimportant, to being actually public. They were, in these social encounters, kind to her, generous—one could almost say, in a whisper, civilized.
