Exploring health promotion theory and nursing practice

Although offering greater breadth and depth and using different nomenclature, Franzkowiak and Wenzel essentially cover the same terrain as McEwan and Bhopal 1991. In addition, the hospital managers were key individuals in ensuring that health promotion activities did not conflict with other work priorities ; ;.

Exploring health promotion theory and nursing practice

Given the full potential scope of nurses' practice, the success of health system reforms such as those in the United States and Australia depend on a nursing workforce that is appropriately educated and supported for innovative practice roles in multiple settings.

The role of the nurse in health promotion

In promoting the health of these different groups, nurses can be regarded as patient-focused health promoters ; ; ;.

These could build on the existing knowledge and experiences of patients, help them develop a sense of autonomy and feel empowered to take responsibility and feel positive.

Nurses Roles in Health Promotion

It seems obvious that entrepreneurial nursing roles are forging the way for this type of partnership by examples of nurses conducting clinics in primary and secondary care and as specialists to manage exacerbations of chronic illness in tertiary care settings. Indeed Rawson 2002 contends that it influenced at least one era of health education. Encouraging Healthiness and Disease Prevention Nurses working in various venues have a great responsibility in preventative care and wellness.

Macleod Clark and Maben 1998 present the findings from a large-scale two-centre case study for the English National Board for Nursing, Midwifery and Health Visiting. One potential explanation alluded to by Rawson 2002 is the new epistemology of practice for health care professionals initiated during the 1980s based on reflection, the codifying of experiences and from these generating practice theory and related goals for intervention. Healthy children have more days in attendance at school and an easier time participating and learning.
