Chapter 1. Our Model for Community Change and Improvement

Community organization is the process of people coming together to address issues that matter to them. An extremely important part of any community assessment, therefore, is to start by finding out as much about the community as you can -- its physical and geographical characteristics, its culture, its government, and its assumptions. Don't limit the ways in which you can record your observations and impressions.

There is an overlap between the community's physical and social characteristics. The last word here is that this shouldn't be the last community description you'll ever do. Does it seem to have a lot of environmental impact -- noise, air or water pollution, smells, heavy traffic? Those doing community work, particularly in low-income communities, are exposed to horrible things: children in uncaring and unhealthy environments; adults without adequate food, clothing, and shelter; and other conditions essential for a decent life.
