Second, in works such as the Treatise on the Origin and especially the essay On Image, Poetry, and Fable 1787 he argued that all language and consequently also all thought is fundamentally figurative or metaphorical in nature—for example, that its grammar typically projects the two genders onto the whole of nature, and that it pervasively involves a set of creative transitions from an object to a sensory stimulus to an individualistically formed image and thence to thought and language—and is thus poetic.
