Methods of identifying and recruiting older people at risk of social isolation and loneliness: a mixed methods review

The effectiveness of interventions to address loneliness and social isolation among older adults has been questioned due to the lack of transparency in identifying and recruiting populations at risk. However, under the terms of the Social Security Act, no federal funds for health-related services are to be made to unlicensed facilities or to residents of unlicensed facilities.

GP services for older people: a guide for care home managers

Future research should explore how best this can be achieved within current service configuration and organisation and if new service initiatives, such as EOLC networks or community dementia palliative care nurses, are required above and beyond usual care to support professionals to deliver good quality care towards, and at, end of life in dementia.

Caring for Frail Elderly People: Policies in Evolution

In care homes, this was achieved through continued contact during and after death.

In these situations post-death reviews were a valuable space to both reflect on practice, and the need for additional training, but also to allow staff to process the deep personal emotions they often felt having cared for a person with dementia for some considerable time.

Local authority funding for an elderly care home

In cases where dependent elderly people had no adult children or other family who could assume these costs, churches or municipalities took on the responsibility. Journal article Implications for strategic commissioning from the experience of front-line practitioners Care coordination undertaken by front-line staff is likely to place increasing demands on the provision and management of resources. You should have only one needs assessment, covering both health and social care needs, to avoid having to repeat the same information to different professionals.
