Roebbling's Delaware Aqueduct
Historical Marker

Iron wire became a trademark of sorts for Roebbling and he incorporated it into all of his major bridges. What makes it unique is how it performed its task: through a

The bridge was then converted to be used by cars and carriages. The inn is right on the Delaware River so there are also some great rafting and kayaking options nearby. It was built to connect two parts of the Delaware and Hudson Canal.

Roebbling's Delaware Aqueduct

Roebbling-on-the-Delaware might as well be known as Roebbling-almost-on-the-Delaware, though, because the town and its park are separated from the river by a long, barbed wire fence seen in the picture at the beginning of this post.
