Foch died on 20 March 1929, and was interred in , next to Napoleon and other famous French soldiers and officers. At the outbreak of war in August 1914, Foch's

In a subsequent memorandum, Foch argued that the Allies should take full advantage of their victory by permanently weakening German power in order to prevent her from threatening France again: What the people of Germany fear the most is a renewal of hostilities since, this time, Germany would be the field of battle and the scene of the consequent devastation. An unintended consequence of Foch's appointment was that he sheltered Haig from British political interference.

In 1907 Foch was promoted to , and in the same year, he assumed command of the French War College. Foch was seen as a master of the Napoleonic school of military thought, but he was the only one of the Military College Commandants Maillard, Langlois, Bonnal still serving. He was strongly criticised for his tactics and the heavy casualties that were suffered by the armies during these battles, and in December 1916 was removed from command by Joffre and sent to command Allied units on the ; Joffre was himself sacked days later.

Their doctrines had been challenged, not only by the German school, but also since about 1911 by a new French school inspired by General Loiseau de Grandmaison, which criticised them as lacking in vigour and offensive spirit and contributing to needless dispersion of force. He successfully coordinated the French, British and American efforts into a coherent whole, deftly handling his strategic reserves. Dust Jacket Condition: Very Good.
