Crisis Management

Their instincts sometimes cause them to react or overreact in ways that make matters worse instead of better. Preventable crises that result from an oversight or a poor decision, however, could drag your name through the mud. Our employees and other team members are our eyes and ears.

I think we tend to use the term business leader, or leader, and look to them, but if this pandemic has taught us anything, it is the helpers — that have come in so many forms — that are making the difference. The NRP is a companion to the National Incident Management System, which acts as a more general template for incident management regardless of cause, size, or complexity. The way executives and directors behave in a crisis can change the fate of thousands of people, entire companies, even an entire industry.
