The following is a compilation of photos that I took during my visits in September 2010 and December 2011. It is another irony of history that teachers of English, French, Spanish, Italian, and German in colleges in the northeastern United States should have perceived teachers of classics as their enemy; in 1883 the ancient languages were still prestigious at elite colleges on the East Coast, but they hardly figured as major players in the system of educational values that was embodied in the public land-grant universities created under the Morrill Act of 1862. I need at least a couple sentences for each of these.
