Rather than as a change in practice, this statement could be understood as an attempt to move Algeria's at least insofar as it's anything but a distraction. In a Christian context, one might explain this by the commandment not to take the name of the Lord in vain.

Note, by the way, that in French télévision is feminine; I'm not sure why she gives it masculine agreement, but probably this reflects the influence of the earlier borrowed form tilivizyun, which regular Arabic phonological gender assignment rules make masculine. A little sympathy on that point could go a long way towards healing the unhelpful political rifts that have been created between some Berber and Arabic speakers. To rescue her, they assemble a veritable team of superheroes: ضَرَاب السيف ḍarāb as-sif, the Sword-Striker; سَمَاع الندى sammaʿ an-nda, the Dew-Hearer to hear the ogre's snores from miles away; ضَرَاب خَطِّ الرَّمْلِ ḍarāb xatt ʾr-rmāl, the Geomancer; and سَلَكَ الحَرِيرِ مِنَ السِّدْرَةِ sollak al-hrir mən-s-sədra, the Disentangler of Thread from the Lote-Tree to disentangle her hair from his teeth.

In most of the Arabic dialects of the Algerian Sahara that I've encountered, Berber influence is rather inconspicuous.

But more investigation is required. My own aunt learned her letters that way before independence - in a school affiliated with the Association of Muslim Ulama, who today are pressing for a school boycott if dialect is officially introduced as a means of primary instruction. And just how badly does this rather polysemous word translate? Practically every Algerian I've ever met assumes - rightly or wrongly - that monolingual language teaching is more effective, or indeed that it's only way to teach a language.

Algeria's Jews had received French citizenship in 1870, and all but the most isolated communities hastened to prove their loyalty to France by, among other things, adopting French as their home language. For any Algerian reader, it's a rather ironic experience to read his strangely familiar-sounding defense of his national language against an unholy alliance of foreign manipulation and unpatriotic elites, cynically claiming to defend minority languages when their real aim is to weaken the national language.

Jabal al

After all, only half of the first grade timetable in Algeria is devoted to learning Arabic; the rest is rather ambitiously divided between Maths, Science and Technology, Islamic Studies, Civics, Art, and PE.

Jabal al

In a , she points out that nearly 10% of Algerian children repeat second grade, and argues that the solution is for the teacher to make more use of the linguistic abilities they come into school with. I won't bother with the statements of party politicians, whose easily predictable positions are meaningless to anyone but the few who still take their game seriously; but it is interesting that quite a few journalists seem to have come out in support. If a government minister can now get away with suggesting publicly that the dialect has a positive role to play in education, then maybe one ten years down the line will be able to make proposals that are currently unthinkable.
