Statistics on Police Recorded Crime in Northern Ireland (Police Service Northern Ireland)

Similarly, the setting up of the Police Ombudsmans office, costing £6 million, however beneficial from a criminal justice perspective, will be of little economic benefit to the communities whose behaviour is seen as presenting a problem.

Police (Northern Ireland) Act 1998

No other area of social life is subject to so much data collection and annual publication. There needs, therefore, to be an open public debate about the wisdom of spending such a high proportion of the overall budget on law and order. Such a view is both out-moded and counter productive in terms of the broader efforts to make the system more widely accepted and more accountable.

For example, many road accidents which cause death and injuries, the miss-selling of pensions, deaths and injuries at work, iatrogenesis medically induced harm, the inability to obtain paid employment or loss of a job, are all significant events which create human trauma and have long lasting consequences. The vast majority of events defined as crime are very minor and do not score, as Hulsman 1986 has eloquently put it, particularly highly on a scale of personal hardship. There have been changes in many countries to make the law tougher.

Furthermore, the Review is visibly more conservative than the Patten Report in its approach to several aspects of transparency and monitoring. The Criminal Justice Review CJR makes the distinction between crime serious enough to mean court intervention and that which is sufficiently trivial to be diverted from formal administration. Reducing offending: an assessment of research evidence on ways of dealing with offending behaviour.
