Perhaps, with its candle burning, Picasso was hoping to keep alive the beacon of humanity, celebrating it, showing it precariously ablaze within a realm of pictures, books and flowers - art, literature and beauty. Jacques Dupin, who chronicled Miró's life and work, became a leading poet in France following the end of the Second World War. The title of the present Miró painting is, in its length, noticeably dissimilar from the brief appellations of a simple generic variety, such as femme, étoile et oiseau or merely peinture, that the artist often attached to his works.
