Agricultural Canada: a Record of Progress

As a result, the relative importance of the US market has declined sharply. The space is self evident. Non-tariff barriers still present in certain jurisdictions -- in the form of regulations on things like meat processing, pesticides and seed technology -- have prevented Canadians exporters from taking full advantage, he said.

In addition to increased domestic agricultural policy expenditures — Chinese agricultural subsidies doubled between 2005 and 2008 — many emerging economies, like some developed countries, continue to rely on tariff and nontariff barriers to encourage domestic production in the name of food security or self-sufficiency. For several decades the international market was dealing with chronic food surpluses, which were made worse by increasing import protection and the pervasive use of export subsidies. Cities Feeding People: An Overview

At the same time, there were significant developments in processing and transportation technology to deliver cheap food, reliably to market, and a mass marketing apparatus to help shape demand.

Prospects for Canadian agriculture in Asia

It is receptive to high quality papers in any field of economics and from any source. However, both the pork and beef sectors are extremely conscious of the need to reduce their exposure to, and dependence on, the US market and see Asia as the key diversification opportunity.
