Haku Minka

Matsuda believed that ethics classes instead should be emphasized, that the compulsory school years should be shortened, and that sports should be encouraged more; according to him, those who practiced Japanese martial arts did not become leftists.

Science for the Empire: Scientific Nationalism in Modern Japan

Ogura argued that wasan did not develop as a practical science partly because the natural sciences and industrial technology were still immature in Tokugawa Japan, but more important, because of its feudal practice—various guildlike schools of wasan would conceal their techniques from one another. The distinction between physical and human geography is rooted in the difference of objects, and, accordingly, they ought to be classified in natural and cultural sciences respectively.

Meanwhile, as mentioned earlier, the Ministry of Education created its own Department of Science, going directly against the purpose of the Outline, which was to consolidate science and technology research programs under one leadership. On the other hand, the foreign origin of Chu Hsi NeoConfucianism made its total absorption impossible.

Japanese geography : a guide to Japanese reference and research materials / Robert B. Hall and Toshio Noh.

The book traces their attempts to define and promote science in the interwar and wartime years and their differing yet equally complicated trajectory toward the wartime collaborative promotion of science. There was a period of submergence and resulting landforms were buried under alluvium.
