From Language to Ethnolect: Maltese to Maltraljan

To examine these issues, this dissertation analyzes local language ideologies and variation in post-vocalic r and the quotative system using ethnographic data and sociolinguistic interviews conducted in 2008 with bilingual, English-dominant participants from four age groups.

It argues that young Maltese people's performative and linguistic constructions of their cultural identities provide a striking example of 'glocal' hybridity, and that, irrespective of whether they choose to claim Maltese or English or a combination of the two as the primary marker of their cultural identity, this hybridity is experienced as a positive performance and expression of selfhood. This quantitative study focuses on the phenomenon of the North-South divide and seeks to analyse whether such geographical distinction also manifests itself in linguistic attitudes. Originality: While documenting lexical development in children exposed to a distinctive language-learning context that is as yet under-researched, this study adds to the limited evidence on lexical expression in young children exposed to substantial lexical mixing in their input.

Careful editorial attention could have avoided some orthographic and typographical errors and run-on words. A generic platform was required for the successful implementation of a number of applications so that they become available on the internet as easily as possible. The language has co-official status in Malta and is an official language of the European Union, but its future is not, however, assured, since it has to compete with English in many domains, the real language of power and prestige in Malta, and cannot rely on the language loyalty of its speakers.

By observing the changes, potential reconstructions of diachronic processes of change are postulated, of which, it is only their final stages that can be observed in synchronic Maltese. The texts making up the existing corpus data are preponderantly drawn from written sources, the large majority being newspaper writing.
