Looking after your mental health while living with a disability

But he argues that it is even less plausible and attractive to view such individuals as suffering grave misfortune, however well they do with their limited potential. Parents of a hearing-impaired child may find it hard to keep the proper balance between protection and expectations, and some parents of hearing-impaired children have a tendency to overprotect their children.

Helping Parents Deal with the Fact That Their Child Has a Disability

According to LaFollette 1996 , love, at least ideally, brings out the best in the participants. But there are also many circumstances in which the differentiation of personal assistant from parent, spouse, or friend will give the person with a disability the freedom and privacy that nondisabled people take for granted. Despite this, subjective accounts may offer only thin practical support for the claim that disabled people are not handicapped in the pursuit of happiness.
