• Meat industry in Denmark

So far, the meat industry seems to be having considerable success with its climate-friendly communications strategy. The statistics on slaughtering of animals cover all slaughtered animals by Danish slaughterhouses distributed by cattle, pigs, sheep and lambs, poultry and horses. Experts had said the meat-free days, even if compulsory, would be unlikely to reduce climate emissions given the size of the livestock sector in the country.

Investigation: How the meat industry is climate

The production of edible offal which comprises livers, hearts, kidneys, tongues and midriffs is estimated as 4. We are extremely efficient at breeding piglets, we have probably the lowest production costs in Europe for producing them. Furthermore, the amounts, which have been directly paid to the producers on the basis of the production, are included.

Livestock production

More than 70 percent of Danish pig meat production is exported to other EU countries, and the remaining part is exported to countries outside the EU. But critics question how necessary that expansion is, and point out that it could be done in different, more climate-friendly ways.
