In addition, places where lions tended to kill prey had a greater effect on ungulate aggregation than places where lions tended to occur, but an opposing pattern existed for hyena. On the other hand, most of the plants that form the basis of northern summer-wet and central semi-arid, rangeland grazing systems in Australia are native to those regions. Human prey preferences were driven by whether prey were arboreal or terrestrial, the threats the prey afforded hunters, and prey body mass.

Chapter 2 International management of shared stocks

Several minor diseases in the southern and southeastern regions gained significance in the central-western region and assumed epidemic proportions there, being supported by conditions favorable to the pathogens temperature, crop residue, and moisture. Where expert opinion was available, these estimates were revised to reflect more precise knowledge of the impact of particular pests.
