Braiding Indigenous and Settler Methodologies: Learnings from a First Nations Health Transformation Project in Manitoba

Capitalism is maintained as the driving economic system, but with more progressive social and tax policies resulting in decreasing income inequality across Canada.

Wahbung: Our Tomorrows Imagined

It must be part of the future.

By contrast, the approach exemplified by All My Relations which involves process negotiation and reciprocity and by Sun, Grass, and Waters one where the processes employed belong to Indigenous people and they choose what non-Indigenous contributions they want will be accepted and so can work.

Summary of Wahbanung

Initially there was some give and take amongst us as to how to incorporate First Nations cultural considerations into the workshops.

In 1998 the Assembly of Manitoba Chiefs gave a mandate and established MFNERC to provide administrative, technical, language and educational supports to First Nations Schools in Manitoba. The coming 50 years bring a stream of shifts toward First Nations self-determination.

Divided into two major sections dealing with on-going relationships and development areas, this book includes chapters on the following: treaties and aboriginal rights; land; hunting rights; The Indian Act; culture; health and social services; housing; education; social development; legal protection; economic development; and reserve government.

Grand Chief Arlen Dumas often refers to Wahbung: Our Tomorrows and respects what our leaders of those days wanted to accomplish. You will be like us. So I think for all of us, as we come here to witness this great paper that we produced, that the Elders have talked about, I want to thank a number of people.

In June, 2012, the AMC amended the mandate of the Centre to offer enhanced second level services school division-type services while moving towards the development of First Nations Education Systems. Our approach to this braiding work has been to learn through doing: for each part of each workshop, we talked through and agreed on the methodology we would use, tried it, got feedback, and then adjusted course.
