In other situations, the emphasis is placed exclusively on the development of particular occupational or practical skills. In most needs assessment cases, many heads will usually be better than one.

Museums in the U.S.

Students who received a tour of the museum were able to recall details about the paintings they had seen at very high rates. As long as they reflect the structure and social organization of the dominant society, they can be expected to perpetuate its values, attitudes, and behavior patterns within an implicit framework of assimilation. Again, the emphasis is on preparation for the roles and expectations associated with membership in the larger society.

Thus, there were not artificial, formal age or grade distinctions.

16 Museums in Partnership With Schools = A Model for Learning

Greater importance should be attached to school-museum relationship. If cultural minorities desire educational opportunities that will prepare them to extend beyond the boundaries of their present existence, they will need to overcome the experiential limitations of the traditional educational system.
