and critique: towards a feminist analysis of by A. Aungles

Punish and Critique begins the task of exploring what a theoretically-informed feminist analysis of penality might look like and, in the process, uncovers a series of disjunctions in the recent critical analyses - for example, disjunctions between 'social histories' of prison regimes on men and feminist histories of the imprisonment of women. In Punish and Critique Adrian Howe argues that a more fully social understanding of punishment must be informed by feminist research on women's imprisonment and by poststructuralist studies of the disciplining of women's bodies.

Journal Information Established as the leading British periodical for socio-legal studies, the Journal of Law and Society offers an interdisciplinary approach. In Punish and Critique Adrian Howe argues that a more fully social understanding of punishment must be informed by feminist research on women's imprisonment and by poststructuralist studies of the disciplining of women's bodies. Over the past twenty-five years, a range of critical perspectives--Marxist, poststructuralist and, less frequently, feminist--has been brought to bear on the subject of punishment and, in particular, on the question of imprisonment in western capitalist societies.

Yet, for all the advances made, the new critical perspectives remain deeply flawed in a significant, but as yet barely acknowledged way--with very few exceptions they are profoundly masculinist .

Considered together, these critical views constitute a formidable challenge to traditional ways of conceptualising punishment.
