The French Formosa expedition, 1884

For over a year prior to China's 'unofficial' declaration of war in 1884, Liu Yung-fu's 'Black Flag' forces effectively harassed the French at Tongking, at times fighting behind entrenched defences or else laying skilful ambushes.

At the same time, the Chinese armies had no prospect whatsoever of driving the French from Hung HÃ³a or ChÃº. In February 1885 a French campaign forced Pan to retreat, and the French troops soon reoccupied the town.

A Timeline of Taiwanese History

The French debacle at Lang Son undermined any support in Paris for a general war with China and probably helped prevent the enormous loss of life that might have resulted from such a conflict. As a result of this reverse, French control over Formosa was limited merely to the town of Keelung. Navy, instead of going forward with decisively defeating the natives, retreated from Formosa and sailed back home.

The first policy was to restrict the qualification and number of migrants who were allowed to cross the and settle in Taiwan. Although many of China's modern ships were state of the art, the personnel manning them were relatively unskilled: according to Rawlinson, only eight of the fourteen ship captains that saw action in the war had received any modern training at all.

The French interpretation was apparently also misunderstood by the imperial court in Hué, which continued its former relationship with China.

Pescadores campaign (1885)

In total, the relief column suffered some five hundred casualties en route to the fort. But he failed to establish a direct communication line with Russian forces.
