The ‘Taiwanisation’ of campaigning in Hong Kong

Examination of such so-called cultural policies will reveal the kind of culture the state intents to build, and also help us understand how certain social and cultural changes came about. Similarly, faced with the possibility of a Green victory in the legislative elections later this year, many candidates standing under the KMT banner, those of local and Taiwanese stock, may be tempted to leave the Nationalist Party to join the Greens, as has regularly occurred in the past. It is important to point out that Taiwanpolitics is generally negatively framed by the mainstream media and the administration, particularly during the Chen Shui-bian era.

In 2001, a brand new education system, the Nine Grade Curriculum Alignment for Elementary and Junior High Education, was launched, integrating the curriculum of elementary and junior-high schools. The evolution of this Taiwanese consciousness, and how it is perceived and presented by major political parties like the Democratic Progressive Party, the Kuomintang, the People First Party and the New Party, are then discussed.

Let us examine a final opposition, which we propose here, and which is based on the notion of consciousness. As we have shown in an earlier contribution to this review, the building of an ethnic, political, symbolic and psychological frontier between the two can be historicised: we can thus determine the main dates. In the present legislature, which will stand down on November 30th 2004, the Blues are one vote short of an absolute majority, and thus depend on one independent vote, which does allow room for debating but assures them of a majority in many cases.

Branding Taiwan articulates an ideal identity and a new version of a national narrative to significant players internationally.

The second article offers a working definition of Taiwanisation. Are some of the Blues manipulative? The war of words has been fierce beyond control, one camp desperate not to see Taiwan back in the hands of a party suspected of appeasement towards China, and the other glimpsing with unequalled anguish the possibility of annihilation. It features key chapters on: the development of party politics in Taiwan the impact of party change on social welfare, corruption and national identity party politics in the DPP era.

The beginning is the end is the beginning

We are both Chinese and Taiwanese.

The Supporters of Unification and the Taiwanisation Movement

What does it say about the stability of democracy in the island, or about the loyalties of those who have the most to lose in the present transition but who, with their political influence, could still thwart or hold back the policy followed by the pro-independence campaigners now in power? LSD candidates speeches were down to earth, spontaneous filled with foul language and particular in televised debates, very aggressive towards the pro-establishment camp. It is an interesting tactic taking cultural policy as a marketing tool to brand a country. At the same time, the parties have competed to portray themselves as the legitimate protectors of minority interests by promoting Hakka and Aboriginal cultures.

From Taiwanisation to De

You mention a really important point regarding the Taiwan connections of Raymond Wong. But is this to say that the present conflict can be explained by a basic opposition between mainlanders and those of Taiwanese origin? Caught between the devil and the deep blue sea by the demonstrations, Peking finally declared that it might intervene if things turned out badly, at the moment when the demonstrations in front of the Central Election Commission were threatening to degenerate, with the first signs of physical violence in Taipei. The pro-independence camp is no more unified over the formal aspects of independence than is the unification camp over those of unification.
