cyrillic

Note um á umá in the original where um is coupled with the possessive particle.

Admin

Often followed by a relative clause. Airím, aireachtaint are more commonly used in WM. Also note the preterite here, do chloiseas, where the CO has chuala mé.

The effects of planned change on Estonian morphology

Note póirsibh here in the dative plural, without a long ending; póirsíbh would be more common in later Irish, derived from the nominative plural póirsí. Note that the r of rug is pronounced slender in some circumstances, e.

cyrillic

PUL regularly used the spelling am briathar, and more research is needed by me here: maybe the m is broad not influenced by the br and so ambriathar is a better spelling? Relative to Scottish Gaelic, Irish has already done a fair amount of this; cf. PUL uses this verb in the first conjugation in most tenses, with seachnód and seachnódh in the future and conditional.
